"The Giver," based on the famous 1993 young adult novel by Lois Lowry, is no exception. November 5, 2009. suggest The Giver's depiction of Christmas at the novel's end implies that an ideal community is in part represented by a family Christmas therefore situating the novel as conservative.[20] Academic, Graeme Wend-Walker, read the Lowry's The Giver trilogy in 2013 through a post-secular lens and suggested removing religion entirely from human society and lives could diminish humanity's capacity for accepting differences rather than providing for human liberation as some may assume.[21] Counteracting Bradford's claim which would suggest that the novel is conservative rather than transformative due to its religious imagery and undertones, Wend-Walker's post-secular reading suggests that the novel explores the ambiguity between the secular and religious binary which provides it progressive potential by allowing for the transformative potential of the spiritual.[22] Color Susan G Lea in her article emphasizes that sameness is crucial to the world of The Giver, and furthermore that their monochromatic vision creates a color blindness within the community that cannot be aware of the effects of the absence of color.[23] She likens the lack of difference and literal color blindness of The Giver's community with color blind attitudes that act as if racial difference does not exist, and suggests that the book shows the way that colorblindness erases people of color and their experiences through their lack of visibility.[24] Kyoungmin and Lee examine Jonas's growing ability to see color rather than the lack of color in his community and argue that his selfhood grows as his memory and perception of color grow.[25] They suggest that Jonas's full perception of color at the end is what allows him to choose to travel elsewhere as an autonomous agent in comparison to others in his community.[26] Eugenics and gene editing Elizabeth Bridges reads an implication of gene editing in the development of the homogeneous community onto the text based on euphemistic language throughout the novel.[27] She further suggests the release of those who do not fit societal conventions represent the ways that eugenics were employed by the society of The Giver.[28] Robert Gadowski suggests that government control of bodies inhibits the society's freedoms.[29] He argues that through bio-technical planning, people's bodies become vehicles of state control rather than the locus of their autonomy.[30] Literary significance and reception While critical reception of The Giver has been mixed, the novel has found a home in "City Reads" programs, library-sponsored reading clubs on citywide or larger scales.[31][32]The Giver, a part of Dystopian literature has left many readers questioning the classification of Lowry's novel.[33] Some readers have felt that The Giver should be listed under "Young Adult Fiction" due to its graphic content detailing euthanasia, mental health and death.[34] While the reception of The Giver has received critical acclaim and its share of accolades, it has remained a challenged novel by several schools for many generations. [10] Background Lois Lowry was born March 29, 1937, in Honolulu, Hawaii.[11] When asked, Lowry stated that her books vary in content and style.[12] Still when reading them it seems that all of them have the same topic, which is, in Lowry's own words, "the importance of human connection... the vital need for humans to be aware of their interdependence, not only with each other, but with the world and its environment.[13] Like Lowry's other books, The Giver shows changes in the characters' lives, reflecting this fascination in the multifaceted dimensions of growing up.[14] In her Newbery Medal acceptance speech in 1993, Lowry explains that The Giver was inspired by many experiences throughout her life, including Lowry's interaction with her father, who "became an inspiration for The Giver, a novel in which people are deprived of the memories of suffering, grief, and pain." [15] She also explains that she began writing The Giver by creating an imaginary world that readers would recognize and feel comfortable in.[15] Lowry also mentions that it is tempting to live in a walled-in world where violence, poverty, and injustice technically do not exist, but when doing that we forget about the people who are experiencing pain and injustice.[16] Lowry said of the people living in The Giver, they have lived in a sterile world for so long that they are in danger of losing the real emotions that make them human.[16] Analysis Memory in their book, Bradford et al. Articulate, argue that The Giver represents a community where the lack of cultural memory leads to an inability to avoid societal mistakes, preventing the community from becoming a true Utopia, thus conferring transformational potential on human memory.[17] Hanson interprets the restriction of memory as totalitarian and argues that Lowry demonstrates the emancipatory potential of memory in The Giver.[18] Triplett and Han suggest that Jonas's role as receiver of memory, allowing him a deeper understanding of his societal and cultural context, demonstrates the validity of suspicious methods of reading that attempt to obtain deeper rather than surface meanings.[19] Religion Bradford et al. 120-121.
